The topic of changing a career path and a place of living multiple times throughout one's life has been considered controversial. ^{while} some believe it to be a progressive mindset, ~~which leads to people gaining experience and finding their true passions~~, others consider such behaviour to be inappropriate in terms of traditional values.

I personally stand ^{for} the opinion that the rising number of people, who are not afraid to change the course of their life, is indeed a positive development. Due to many students obligated to choose their future job as early as 17 or 18, not all of them make the right choice in a span of a moment. Some realise their mistake in college, some at work, but either way they end up in a desperate need for change. In this situation it is better to take a risk, rather than do something you hate for the rest of your life.

In contrary, others prefer to settle down and are disapproving with the idea of constant movement. They think, that changing a life course is not only a huge risk, but an unnecessary decision, which leads to even worse consequences such as not having a family, performing poorly at new career and not being able to become an expert in the field.

I disagree with this argument because none of the things mentioned above can be achieved while one is not happy with one's current life. It is better to risk it ~~all~~, rather than not ^{to} try. Finding yourself is a life-long journey, that inevitably requires risks, mistakes and changes.

To sum up, general masses' opinions on the given topic vary due to different life values. But the question all of us need to ask ourselves remains: Will I be brave enough to go in many directions until I find my own way of happiness? =
