Should students have a long summer holiday or should terms be longer? I think summer holidays should be shorter by a month, but terms should last the same. This benefits learning, doesn't harm summer activities, benefits students, and makes summertime more productive.

Everybody knows that the most people require free time to relax, get prepared for a week. Students require more free time, because they are young and only getting used to working and studying a lot. Summer holidays, you may think, solve this problem, when actually it only makes things worse. Summer holidays are so long, that students forget 80% of what they learned, making schools re-teach the same material for a month, and it happens every year. Instead of just shortening the holidays, we should transfer it to a five study days a week, or even four. This will make students less stressed and tired, thus making learning more effective.

Despite the popular opinion, quality of holidays won't be harmed by shortening the duration. Average vacation to a seaside doesn't take up more than two weeks. Rest of the time teenagers usually spend in their gadgets or hanging out. Moreover, recognising the fact that holidays are shorter, might make students spend them more wisely. To sum up, decreasing summer holidays doesn't harm students at all, it's rather benefiting them in learning and relaxing.
